¹Peace and Friendship Treaties do not involve the transfer of land title and are therefore not individually represented on the map.
²Pre-Confederation Upper Canada Treaties are not individually shown because of map scale limitations.
³Treaty boundary lines are approximate.
⁴Extension of a treaty boundary as a result of later signatories who adhered to the terms of the original treaty.

The process of dealing with aboriginal title and rights through formal agreement began shortly after contact was established between Europeans and the Indian peoples of North America. The first agreements, concluded during a period of continual warfare between England and France, were intended to secure the neutrality or assistance of the Indian nations in exchange for a commitment not to impede them in their traditional pursuits. Several of these treaties of peace and friendship were concluded by the Crown and various Maritime Indian tribes up until the end of the 18th century.

Over time, however, treaty-making came to serve other purposes. As the colonial powers became more established, treaties became the instruments used by the Crown to clear lands of aboriginal title, so that settlement or resource development could proceed. The turning point in this evolution was the Royal Proclamation of 1763, which established a process to be followed in the acquisition by the Crown of clear title to Indian lands. Following the Proclamation, the Crown concluded a number of land-cession agreements with the Indians of present-day southern Ontario so that land would be available for the settlement of United Empire Loyalists, and for the Crown's military allies, the Iroquois. In these treaties, title was conveyed to the Crown in exchange for lump-sum payments, and after 1818, for annuities. It was not until the Robinson Treaties of 1850, concluded to clear aboriginal title in areas of northern Ontario, that provision was also made for reserves and the freedom to hunt and fish on unoccupied Crown land. The 14 Douglas treaties of 1850-54, on southern and eastern Vancouver Island, also provided for hunting and fishing rights.

In 1867, the British North America Act (now the Constitution Act, 1867) gave jurisdiction over "Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians" to the Government of Canada. In the years following Confederation, the federal government undertook a process of clearing aboriginal title to facilitate the construction of a railroad to the west coast, and the expansion and consolidation of Canada through settlement. In the resulting "numbered treaties", the Indians surrendered all title to the lands covered, and in return, received tracts of land for reserves. In addition to the provision of reserve lands, benefits common to many of the western treaties included annuities, gratuities, schools, hunting and fishing rights, gifts of agricultural implements and cattle, annual cash payments for ammunition and twine, and clothing, flags, and medals. These "numbered treaties" encompassed most of the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Mackenzie District of the Northwest Territories. Treaty No. 8 covered the northeast corner of British Columbia, while two treaties signed in 1923 covered the area south and east of Georgian Bay.

Modern comprehensive land claims agreements have followed the pattern established by treaty-making, although they are much more complex than treaties. Since 1962, existing aboriginal and treaty rights have been recognized and affirmed by subsection 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. As a result of the constitutional amendments of June 1984, "treaty rights" include rights that now exist by way of land claims agreements or may be so acquired.
