

Territorial Evolution, 1920

Abstract

The boundaries of the districts within the Northwest Territories are redescribed in 1920. Canada's long and diversified settlement history is reflected in the two distinct patterns of boundaries that differentiate between eastern and western Canada. The eastern boundaries closely conform to natural features such as drainage basins, while the boundaries of western and northern Canada reflect the administrative organisation of these lands by, first, the Hudson's Bay Company and later the Government of Canada.

Canada

With the creation of two new provinces in 1905, and the northern extensions of Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec in 1912, the boundaries of the Northwest Territories had also been changed, but the changes had not been made officially. In 1918, by an Order in Council, the boundaries of the territories were defined, but the changes only took effect in 1920.

Northwest Territories

The boundaries of each of the territories were redefined in 1918 and became effective in 1920. The District of Mackenzie was described as the area bounded by the Yukon Territory, the Arctic Ocean, 102nd meridian of longitude, and the 60th parallel of latitude.

The boundaries of the District of Keewatin were defined as being the 102nd meridian of longitude, the Arctic Ocean, a line across the Melville Peninsula, through Frozen Strait to the northern tip of Quebec, the shores of Hudson and James bays, and the 60th parallel of latitude. Therefore, the District of Keewatin incorporated all of Hudson and James bays.

The District of Franklin was described as the area of the Northwest Territories not included in either the District of Mackenzie or the District of Keewatin. The District of Franklin included the whole of Hudson Strait.

Animation of the territorial evolution of Canada from 1867 to 1999

The animation, Territorial Evolution 1867 to 1999_e.gif is located in the animated gif folder.

Canada's boundaries are dynamic political structures that reflect the changing political, economic and cultural conditions of the country through time. This animation shows sequentially the history of boundary changes in Canada from Confederation to the creation of Nunavut.
